B

How many times have we decided not to try because we were told that we couldn't? How many times have we told ourselves that we would fail before we even started? A man did something different to me.

About half a year ago, I joined a gym. Every morning, there was one personal trainer there that worked out at the same time that my little group does our workout. A couple of weeks ago, I was watching him do chin ups. I broke away from my group and asked him if I could try a chin up. I had never tried before, but he just made it look so easy. He eagerly stepped aside and encouraged me to step up to the bar. I pulled myself up without thinking. . . once. . . then twice. That was all I had in me, I had no strength left. I told him that was all I had, so he stepped up behind me and pushed me up for a third and fourth "pull." It felt so good. I felt strong and I smiled from ear to ear.

The next day, the third day and so on, again I did two. When I am about to quit, he said he was impressed with my chin ups. He told me that when they were training firefighters, the men were required to do 5 chin ups, and women were required to do 1 or 2. He explained that most people couldn't do them at all, and that he was impressed that I could. He further told me that if I practiced every day, I would be doing 5 or 6 in no time. At this point I should probably add that I am 50 years old...and female.

I have a new idea now. I personally want to be like my trainer: standing there behind the people that I love, encouraging them, believing in them and being ready to catch them when they get tired. I will be the one that is there on the second and third day making sure they try again, because I know they CAN.

  - B. The author wants to be a trainer.

64. What can we infer from the passage?

C

My six-year-old daughter, Cindy, and I stopped at a food shop for some bread. As we were going out of the door, a young teenage boy was coming in.

The boy had a strange hairstyle. His nose was pierced (穿孔), and a ring ran through the hole. He held a skateboard under one arm and a basketball under the other.

Cindy, who was walking ahead of me, suddenly stopped when she saw the boy. I thought he had frightened my daughter. But I was wrong. My daughter backed up against the door and opened it as wide as it would go. Now I came face to face with the young man. I stepped aside and let him pass. He replied very politely, "Thank you very much."

On our way to the car, I praised Cindy for holding open the door for the boy. It seemed that she was not troubled by the boy's appearance, but I still wanted to make sure. I wanted to be ready to talk about the young man who was so different from others. I prepared to tell my little daughter what teenagers should be like.

But it turned out that the person who needed the talk was me!

The only thing that Cindy noticed about the boy was the fact that his arms were full. "He held a skateboard under one arm and a basketball under the other. It would be hard for him to open the door," said Cindy.

I just paid attention to the hairstyle, the piercing and the ring, while she saw a person carrying something under arms and heading towards a closed door.
