	I like Chinese chili sauce. Lao Gan Ma is one of the best sauces, I think. There’s a picture of a woman on the bottle. If my friends see me eating three pieces of bread with a bottle of it, they will not be surprised. They know now I get used to the chili sauce taste and fall in love with it. ——By Hamlus Goodwin,34,the USA
	I would surely have to say that I love Chinese phones, especially my Hua-wei smart phone with HarmonyOS system. Its battery can last about 48 hours. I often watch short videos on it. This phone is cheap, acts as if it costs twice. In fact, it’s less than $ 500. ——By Aiden Sampson,36,Canada

Many companies have made apps to help blind people. Microsoft made apps that can describe a photo. Huawei made an app that can tell users if people are happy, sad or angry. Now, Google is testing an app that will allow blind people to run alone.

Panek, CEO of Guiding Eyes for the Blind, had always loved running. But he started losing his eyesight when he was 8, and by his early 20s he was blind. Later in life, he started running with other people or a guide dog to help him. But he didn't like this way. He asked a group of scientists of Google to make something to help blind people run on their own.

The Google team soon made Project Guideline. The Guideline app uses a smartphone camera to recognize a line painted on the ground. Through earphones, the app makes sounds when a person moves away from the line. The sounds get louder in either the left ear or the right ear the further the person moves away from the line.

After trying the app, Panek used it while running outside in a park. In November, 2020, when he was 38 years old, Panek successfully ran 5 kilometers around New York City's Central Park using the app.

Panek hopes that the app Project Guideline can help more people like him. And Google will improve Project Guideline to help the blind.
