When I first went to Britain, a lot of things seemed strange to me. For example, people drove on the left side of the road and many people carried an umbrella all the time. There were also many other things that I found really surprising.

The first thing I noticed was how polite British people were. When I got on the bus, the driver would greet me; when people got off the bus, they would say "thank you" to the driver; when I went into a shop, I would be greeted by a smiling salesman.

The family I stayed with were very nice, but their house was full of peculiar things. Firstly, there were carpets everywhere, even in the bathroom. Also the bathroom was full of surprises. The first time I tried to wash my hands I burned myself. The cold and hot water came out from different taps. Then, when I tried to dry my hair, I couldn't find a socket for my hairdryer. Maybe that wasn't such a big surprise. More surprising was the fact that British people didn't take their shoes off when they went into a house—can you imagine?

I guess that for British people all of these things are normal. It's only when you visit a foreign country that you will realize that what you think is normal or not. Normality depends on where you are.

- ( ) 64. What does the writer think is normal when entering a house?
A. Taking your hat off. B. Washing your hands.
C. Taking your shoes off. D. Leaving your umbrella outside.

One Possible Version:

Should teenagers be allowed to bring mobile phones to school?

Nowadays mobile phones are becoming more and more popular among the middle school students. Some students think that it is easy to use them to keep in touch with parents and classmates and they can use them to listen to music or take photos. But we'd better not take mobile phones to school. I think at school we should put our heart to study rather than anything else. Besides, it is bad for our eyes and also a waste of time. If we depend on phones too much, it surely will influence our study.
