(C)

Animals in protected areas are usually safe. Few people can bring danger to them. But are they safe from the danger of too much light?

Studies show that nights in protected areas are becoming less dark. Even out in the forests, nights are getting brighter with light from houses, street lights, and faraway cities. The light might not seem bright to us, but too much light at night can be dangerous to animals. It may disturb animals' sleeping and birds' flying, and make it easier for predators(捕食性动物) to catch other animals. Experts say that there should be less light around these areas. For example, people can use street lights that shine down, or make other city lights less bright at night. These are small things, but they can be a good start.

根据短文内容选择最佳答案。

- () 41. The underlined word "disturb" in the passage means " _____ " in Chinese.
