If I want you to give me a high five, can you do it? It's a kind of body language. It's very popular in America, but now lots of people in China also like doing that. How should we do a high five? It's easy. First, put one hand up in the air. Then slap(拍)someone's hand—also high in the air. When people have something happy, they always use this body language.

There are different stories about how the high five began. One story goes like this: A very long time ago, some American men saw a group of animals. They were so excited and they put their hands up in the air. At that time, they just wanted to hit (击) each other.

In another story, some short men met some taller men, so they had to put their hands up high to shake hands with them. And from then on, it became popular.

Next time when you meet an American student, he may give you a high five. That means he wants you to feel at home.

Dear John,

How are you? I am writing to tell you about what I did last weekend.

It was a busy weekend. On Saturday morning, I had a piano lesson from 8:10 to 10:10 with my sister. Then at 10:30, I went over(复习) history, because history is a bit difficult for me. After lunch, I had a rest, and then I played basketball with my brother from 2:30 to 3:10. Basketball is my favourite sport. At 3:30, I went out and did some shopping with my mother. I bought a present for Sam, because that day was his birthday. In the evening, I went to Sam's house and attend (参加) his birthday party. After the party, we played computer games together.

On Sunday morning I went to the City Park with my friends. We took a walk and collected litter in the park. In the afternoon I had a dance lesson. I like dancing very much.

What a busy but interesting weekend!

Yours,
Tom
