Weekday mornings are very busy for the U.S. middle school students. When your school doesn't have a bus, and you live too far away to walk, you need a carpool (拼车). A carpool is a group of people sharing the responsibility (责任) of driving to school in the morning. There are usually four or five kids in a carpool and their parents take turns to drive the kids in their cars.

Someone's car smells like wet dogs. Some kids get to eat desserts for breakfast and some parents shout so much that all you try to do is to stay quiet and go unnoticed. When your mum or dad drives the carpool, your classmates get a close-up look at how strange your parents can be. It might be your first sociological (社会学的) study and your first time to work with others.

Teamwork is really important in the carpool because nobody wants to make anyone else late. It's a great lesson in responsibility. Imagine sitting in the car outside of a classmate's house, watching the clock and counting the seconds. Then you start to understand how your carpool friends might feel when you are still inside the house at 7:48. You really begin to learn all your real life lessons just moments before the start of school — in the carpool.

What will things be like in the year 2080? No one knows. But it is fun to have a guess at it. Let's make this story about you in the year 2080.

You wake up at 7: 00 in the morning. You get dressed. Guess what the clothes are made of. Paper? Glass? Or something we don't even know about today?

You don't have to cook breakfast because all the food may be ready for eating. Now you start to work. But how do you go to work? You don't go by car. You step onto a moving sidewalk. It takes you right to the train station. There you take the train. How will it run? On one rail high over the street? Or will it ride in the air? Three o'clock comes. Your work is done for the day. "I'll call John, a friend of mine," you say.

John answers the video phone. You and he can hear and see each other.

"What shall we do this Saturday?" you ask. "Shall we put on our rocket belts (腰带) and take a short trip? Or shall we go for a ride in a flying boat?"
